LiveKill has been consistently pushing the boundaries of their craft and amassing a dedicated fanbase with their unrelenting energy and gripping compositions. The release of "The Crown" showcases the evolution of the band's storytelling ability.

When Eddie Van Halen passed away I wanted to write a heavy hitting song with a relatable theme - where the listener could insert their own heroes and the impact they had on them and those around them.”

John Snell

The theme of "losing your heroes" takes center stage in "The Crown" as the band delves deep into the emotional journey of grappling with the impermanence of those we look up to. This introspective exploration is magnificently captured in the accompanying video, shot and directed by Thomas Crane of killDevil Films. The video is the first of a three-part narrative arc. Fans can expect an immersive experience that resonates with the intensity of LiveKill's music and brings the music alive visually to draw the listener into the story.

Producer and guitarist [John Snell] shares, "When Eddie

Van Halen passed away I wanted to write a heavy hitting song with a relatable theme - where the listener could insert their own heroes and remember the impact they had on them and those around them. We wanted to confront the concept of heroism and how we perceive our heroes. 'The Crown' takes listeners on a journey of realization, blending raw emotion with our signature sound. The video trilogy adds an entirely new dimension to the music, allowing us to tell a more intricate tale."
