Definition:

A vacuum pump is a mechanical device used to remove air or gas molecules from a sealed or enclosed space, creating a vacuum. It is commonly used in various applications where the presence of air or gas needs to be minimized or eliminated, such as in scientific research, manufacturing processes, medical equipment, and many other industries. The primary function of a vacuum pump is to create a pressure difference between the system being evacuated and the surrounding environment. By removing air or gas molecules from the system, the pressure inside decreases, resulting in a vacuum. This is achieved by various techniques, including positive displacement, momentum transfer, entrapment, or combinations of these methods. The choice of vacuum pump depends on the specific requirements of the application, such as the desired level of vacuum, pumping speed, gas compatibility, and the presence of contaminants. It's essential to select the appropriate pump to ensure optimal performance and efficiency.
