Being distinguished as a Chatapreneur business by the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma holds special significance for us. It's a nod to our hard work, and a bridge connecting tradition with the present.”

On the occasion of its first anniversary, the Fort Towson Depot Steakhouse stands as an exemplary testament to the power of private-public collaboration. The collective vision of owners Judy Fuhrhop and Cathey Carothers, synergized with the support from the town of Fort Towson, has not only resulted in a culinary landmark but also fostered communal unity and economic upliftment.

From the genesis of their venture, Ms. Fuhrhop and Ms. Carothers envisioned a gastronomic haven in Fort Towson.

Their dedication found resonance in the heart of the community and its leaders, propelling their endeavor into a successful reality.

"It was our dream to offer Fort Towson a dining experience par excellence, and with the town's unyielding backing, we have achieved more than we ever hoped," stated co-owner Judy Fuhrhop.

Further embellishing their achievements, the Fort Towson Depot Steakhouse has been honored by the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma as a Chatapreneur business. This accolade celebrates indigenous entrepreneurship and modern-day success while holding onto traditional roots.

Co-owner Cathey Carothers expressed, "Being distinguished as a Chatapreneur business by the Choctaw Nation of Oklahoma holds special significance for us. It's a nod to our hard work, and a bridge connecting tradition with the present."

The contributions of the steakhouse to the local economy, particularly in terms of employment, have been remarkable. The town's leadership, especially under Mayor Tami Barnes, has been pivotal in championing such private initiatives. Mayor Barnes noted, "Our community thrives when we stand shoulder to shoulder with dedicated entrepreneurs. The success of the steakhouse solidifies this belief."

With eyes set on a promising future, the Fort Towson Depot Steakhouse, in unison with the town, looks forward to another year of growth, collaboration, and culinary brilliance.
