

American IRA explains What is a Self-Directed IRA for Joint Ventures

Joint ventures can be a powerful way to invest—including within a Self-Directed IRA, notes a recent post at American IRA's blog.

EINPresswire.com/ -- For most retirement advice, it's all about what one person can do. But as a recent post at American IRA notes, not all retirement investing has to be about one person. Retirement investing can also include joint ventures and partnerships, when investors use a Self-Directed IRA, and these arrangements can open up all sorts of opportunities for the individuals doing the investing. As the post at American IRA notes, "The advantage is that this spreads wealth and risk to multiple parties, which can potentially create benefits for the individual investor who joins one."

How does it work? According to the article, investors can use a joint venture—defined as two parties joining together for a specific business venture, but not necessarily a long-term partnership—to execute trades such as a purchase of real estate. The investors could then turn around and sell the real estate at the profit, ending the joint venture. This can be particularly useful for large investments, when two or more parties need to come together to have the capital to make the investment that any one of the individual parties would otherwise not be able to make.

In the post, American IRA broke down several different questions and answers to how joint ventures might work within a Self-Directed IRA. For example, one section, "Why Do Investors Choose Joint Ventures?", dealt with the advantages and benefits of investing this way. While there is certainly no requirement that investors with a Self-Directed IRA use joint ventures, it's yet another option in a wide list of retirement investment options available to those investors who choose a Self-Directed IRA.

"Not many people realize all they can do within a Self-Directed IRA," said Jim Hitt, CEO of American IRA. "But in this post, we broke down one of the specific uses of a Self-Directed IRA to help demonstrate all of the options available to investors."
