Benzenoids are aromatic chemical compounds with one or more aromatic rings. They are naturally found in flowers, leaves, and timber, and are also synthesized in the laboratory. The growth of the market is driven by the increasing demand for benzenoids in the fragrance and flavoring industry, the expanding pharmaceutical industry, and the rising food and beverages industry. The market for benzenoids is influenced by several factors, including the demand from end-user industries, technological advancements, and regulatory policies.

The benzenoid market is globally distributed, with significant production and consumption occurring in regions such as North America, Europe, Asia Pacific, and Latin America. The market dynamics in each region can vary based on factors like industrialization, economic growth, and regulatory frameworks.

Covid-19 Scenario:

The outbreak of the COVID-19 pandemic had a positive impact on the growth of the global benzenoid market, due to consistent demand from the personal care, flavor & fragrance, and other sectors.

During the pandemic, the demand for benzenoid increased rapidly in the healthcare and pharmaceutical sectors. This is because, the demand for soaps and detergents increased dramatically due to their ability to reduce the risk of coronavirus infection.

However, because of regulations imposed by the governments of several countries, soap and detergent manufacturers were not able to continue operations in a full sway.
