people can travel safely and respect the laws of the local lands, it is a good experience for the traveler and the local community members. This contract we have between others to act in civil ways and to respect one another's land and property are fundamental principles for all time. Thomasino's family includes several teachers who inspired her to put together these books to teach important lessons to children about unexpected events and the importance of travel.

Thomasino shared, "My cousin is a teacher in Hell's Kitchen in New York City, and I reflect on her childhood experiences and my own. It varies what happens in our day to day and unexpected events happen to everyone. I applaud her, other teachers, and parents for their bravery during the last few years and present. It's up to us to hold the line and create places of safety for children to thrive. My parents always made sure I had an environment where I could be highly creative. I think about other children that have different experiences. My other cousin's husband is a special education teacher in Wisconsin. Along the way, I met teachers from Portland, Oregon, who were kind enough to give me feedback on the first drafts of my books for the series. At the same time, they were leaders in their communities to the children. We must continue to have tools to teach values to our youth. For households, it's essential to have multiple ways to teach these lessons to ensure the child in our community feel empowered and know how to work to achieve their goals. "

This new playful multi-volume series, The Life of Gumbo, takes you on a journey across the country. Gumbo, a rescue dog, leaves the southern streets of NODA Charlotte, North Carolina, to live on the west coast in Los Angeles, California. Gumbo and his Mommy overcome unexpected events and have lots of new fun experiences on their journey in life together. The design was intended for various audiences, including but not limited to adults, children, and older people. There are nuggets for all of us to learn about self-care and partnership.
