Definition:

Components or goods made using the aluminum extrusion method are referred to as aluminum extruded products. Aluminum extrusion is a manufacturing technique in which a cylindrical billet or ingot of aluminum is heated to a certain temperature and then pressed through a die to achieve the desired form. A wide variety of aluminum items with intricate cross-sectional profiles are frequently produced using this method. Products made from aluminum extrusion are prized for their adaptability, light weight, and exceptional corrosion resistance. Aluminum extrusions are suited for a variety of applications across many industries since the extrusion process enables the fabrication of complicated shapes with constant dimensions.
