Nathan McCusker, President and Co-Founder of Angry

Horse shared his excitement about this year's festival, saying, "We're thrilled to be a part of this celebration. It's an opportunity to showcase our dedication to crafting beers that bring people together.”

Nathan's enthusiasm for hops extends beyond the festival, as he recently recounted his experience harvesting hops at Thomsen Hop Farm in Tracy, California. In his blog on Angry Horse's website, he described the process and how “the journey began with a six-plus-hour drive up to the central valley after work, and, after 3 hours of sleep, we were up before the sun to start cutting bines on the farm.” The trip resulted in bringing back 55 pounds of hops that went immediately into Angry Horse's first wet hop beer produced this year.

Nathan also wrote about how California's Gold Rush of the mid-1800s served as a major catalyst for hop farming in California. As new settlers poured into the region, they brought with them a demand for beer and, thus, an opportunity for hop cultivation in the Golden State. Hops are a crucial ingredient in beer production, as they impart a variety of distinct flavor and aroma profiles. In fact, the wide selection of beer styles and flavors available to consumers is directly attributed to the diversity in hop selection and a range of different brewing methods.

Angry Horse Brewing is thrilled to be part of the Wet Hop Cali Beer Festival event, celebrating California's hop culture and showcasing its commitment to craft beer excellence. As pioneers of the Independent Beer Movement, they continue to champion local and sustainable brewing practices, aiming to create a positive impact on both their community and the environment.
