Gas to liquid (GTL) is a transformative process that converts gaseous hydrocarbons, such as natural gas or associated gas, into liquid hydrocarbons. This conversion holds significant importance in the energy industry due to its potential to create a more versatile and transportable form of energy, particularly in regions where gas infrastructure is limited or where transporting gas over long distances is impractical. GTL provides a way to diversify energy sources by converting abundant natural gas reserves into liquid fuels, reducing reliance on crude oil.
