Brown is a photojournalist who has won multiple awards throughout his nature photography career. He has received several awards and recognitions, such as Nature's Best Publications Winner, Smithsonian's Top 5 Wildlife Photographs, and National Audubon Photograph Winner.

"For over forty-five years, I've enjoyed the nature of the world. Born and raised in the country of the Teton Mountains, Devils Tower, and great Hugh Plains, I've never been in want of something to photograph. My first camera, given to me by parents on my eleventh birthday, a Kodak Browning, instilled in me a higher love for nature and photography. It started first with my father, who, when I was old enough to follow along, taught me the behavior and habits of wildlife. Throughout my youth, I would spend countless hours in the Wyoming wilderness hunting, fishing, tracking, and photographing nature. After starting a family, I spent several years working during the day and taking photography classes at night. Studying under some of the top photographers of our time, Jay Maisel, Tom Mangelsen, Bill Allard, John Sexton and many more, I've worked to bring the life of nature to those who desire to look on the trails less traveled. I spend most of my time now photographing the Wild Horses of Central Wyoming, working to keep them wild and free for generations to come."

Brown is known nationally and internationally. His work promotes awareness of the growing loss of America's wild horses on public lands. He is a champion for Wyoming's wild horses and a featured speaker in many wild horse online preservation events. He shared this comment, "We are living in a time where we see the greed of a few powerful people working to take our public lands and destroy our wildlife including our wild horses."

He talked about a few of the pieces on display or soon to be on display. Cold Bull will be on display for the grand opening event. Brown shares, "Cold Bull sold out several years ago. However, I kept one print for myself and received one back because of a death in the family a few months ago, so one will be back on the wall in the new gallery. I still love the feel of that -20 below morning in Lamar Valley and seeing this big bull buffalo walking towards me. Doing the first thing that comes to mind when a massive buffalo is coming towards you, I laid down on the trail and started photographing him. Enjoy the Wild."

Coming to the gallery in time for Christmas, "we're releasing two prints from our Southern France trip. The first print, 'Dream Runners', will be available in a 48" x 32" metal print. It can also be special ordered in other sizes."
