Ursula Kizy, Director for North America, says, “The U.S. economy proved to have more strength and endurance than previously anticipated by analysts, who predicted an oncoming recession at the start of 2023. Consumption didn’t decrease as anticipated, companies continued to invest in research and development, and increased local government spending led the way out of an impending recession. Noticeably, several sectors saw dramatically increased interest from investors this year, underpinning investor confidence in a sturdy economic outlook.

The All-America Executive Team survey gives investment professionals the opportunity to independently nominate corporate executives and IR teams who embody not just strong financial performance, but more specifically clarity in communication, trustworthiness and reliability. We are once again honored to recognize our corporate winners for performance excellence.”
