The concept of coalition governments, according to Beltrones, is crucial for Mexico's transition to a more mature democracy. He posits that such governments would end the era of divided administrations and usher in an epoch of shared governance, with a focus on secure, long-term public policies that envision the future of Mexico for the next generation.

Beltrones' vision extends beyond mere electoral alliances, emphasizing the need for coalitions that guarantee good governance post-elections. He has been vocal about the current political system's exhaustion and the urgent need for instruments that swiftly reach consensus in a pluralistic society.

His international relevance comes from the fact that coalition governments are a common practice in many democratic countries, and Beltrones' advocacy places Mexico in line with global democratic trends. His insights into coalition politics are particularly pertinent as nations worldwide grapple with political polarization and the challenges of governance in diverse societies.

Beltrones' call for political reforms and coalition governments is not just a national concern but resonates with global discussions on democratic practices and governance. As Mexico continues to play a significant role on the international stage, the ideas championed by Beltrones could influence broader debates on democracy and collaborative governance.
