HIGHLAND HEIGHTS, OHIO, UNITED STATES, November 28, 2023 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Whoa Dough, a renowned brand committed to providing delicious, vegan snacks, is thrilled to share its recent donation of 25,000 Whoa Dough bars to Vegans of LA, the first black, female-owned vegan food bank in the country.

As part of its Giving Tuesday initiatives, Whoa Dough has supplied these delicious vegan cookie dough snack bars to those in need in Southern California.

"When I found out about Vegans of LA, I knew I wanted to help contribute to their noble cause," said Todd Goldstein, Founder of Whoa Dough. "As someone who suffers from celiac disease, I understand that finding food can be a daily struggle for some people. That's the reason I started Whoa Dough—to ensure a greater variety of delicious, safe, and nutritious alternatives for individuals with celiac disease and gluten sensitivity were available. When you also factor in specific dietary needs like vegan and plant-based, that quest can prove immense."

"We're excited to have been able to provide these better-for-you alternatives to the Vegans of LA," Goldstein added.

"All of us here at Vegans of LA are committed to creating food security and ensuring Southern Californians have greater accessibility to healthier food options, like Whoa Dough," said Gwenna Hunter, Vegans of LA founder. "Our mission is to honor and serve every soul waiting in line with gratitude and respect with the intention that when they leave, they are not only provided with quality nutritious food, but are also filled with hope, light and dignity," she continued.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture study showed an increase in food-insecure households in 2022 when compared to 2021, meaning they had difficulty providing food to all their members due to lack of resources. Whoa Dough is happy to have partnered with Vegans of LA to cut down on food scarcity and hope to shed light on this issue in our country going forward.
