Local payroll is responding to country-specific economic growth, while global payroll is expanding to meet the needs of international companies. This growth is due to the demand for efficient, compliant, and cost-effective HR management in different countries. Many providers claim to have expertise in international payroll. But how can they ensure this? A new international alliance now offers the right answer.

Analysts, such as Gartner, assert that the concept of a "one global service solution" doesn't exist. This viewpoint is echoed by global companies, which give international payroll providers a low rating, citing subpar service quality in many countries. The truth is that there is a lack of direct contact with local salary experts and payroll is often managed by offshore competence centres. This multi-level communication results in significant friction losses. The conclusion is obvious: Payroll is local. Hybrid is normal.
