The platelet and plasma market in Europe is expected to experience substantial growth due to increasing blood transfusion rates. Government initiatives promoting awareness about source plasma collection and the use of plasma protein therapies for rare diseases are contributing positively. Additionally, the growing number of blood transfusions, supported by advancements in healthcare infrastructure, will play a crucial role in driving market expansion in the coming years. The market is further propelled by the advent of technologically advanced platelet and plasma products, addressing critical medical needs in conditions like Hepatitis B and rare diseases, including instances like the use of plasma during the Ebola virus outbreak in West Africa.
