Carter, who is in his sixth NBA season, launched his 501(c)3 to provide youth and their families with educational programs, resources and tools that improve and advance their quality of life. The Boys to Men Mentoring Organization is a nonprofit committed to creating communities of empowerment for all teenage boys on their journey to manhood.

"I understand the kind of impact a single individual can make in the lives of young people," said Carter. "The time is now to leverage my platform to make a difference. I want to help these students achieve their dreams, so that's why I wanted to demonstrate my belief in them and support their development from boys to men."

Carter's parents instilled community and helping others to Wendell Jr. at a young age, which is why it was so important to him to establish the A Platform2 Foundation once he was drafted into the NBA. It's this commitment to charitable work throughout the Central Florida region that led to Carter receiving the Rich & Helen DeVos Community Enrichment Award last season, handed out annually to the Magic player that's made the biggest impact off the court in enhancing other's lives.
