“Sometimes work turns into a routine, while in auto sales, you should be highly motivated not only to get money but to help your customers find their dream cars. Experienced salespeople are susceptible to job burnout, so we strive to help our employees achieve a work-life balance and find their calling. The top management is investing in professional training and introducing innovations in business processes to make our work more satisfying,” Ariel Tanner, HR manager for Indy Auto Man. “We are proud to say that our top management supports new ideas and is ready to discuss the craziest things about innovations, which are usually born in conjunction with personal hobbies and the company's working demands. This way, there are several semi-professional photographers and training tutors available to Indy Auto Man employees, and if anyone wishes, they can even request their own video to be posted on the company's YouTube channel.”

The unique approach to organizing work, openness, and friendliness of the IAM leaders, starting with co-founders Victor Figlin and Eugene Gorin, makes it possible for the HR department to take every opportunity to help employees progress in their field.

“We support each worthy initiative and strive to bring it to success, whether it be mural art on our service center buildings or a new way to make photo and video presentations of cars,” says Victor Figlin.
