Fueled by the legacy of her hardworking parents, who carved out their American success story, Turner has embraced her role as a business owner, seeking to radiate positivity in the community that warmly welcomed her.

In a heartfelt moment, Turner shares, "My parents embedded the values of hard work and giving back in me. Their journey laid the foundation for mine, and with Domadera Design, I'm painting Frederick with hues of diversity and inclusivity in their honor.

Turner's father came to America from the Dominican Republic and her mother from Guatemala. The two met in Washington, D.C. while attending church services. After Turner was born, they moved to Puerto Rico where her parents ran an old printing company. It was there Turner first learned woodworking while helping her father around the clock in the shop.

When Turner turned 21 years old, she moved back to the Frederick area and began her journey.

"This community has a special place in my heart," said Turner. "I'm on a mission to enrich it through my craft."

Turner's artistic journey unfolds within the walls of her home in Lake Linganore, Maryland, where she painstakingly crafts each piece by hand in her garage. In this intimate space, her creations come to life, embodying a personalized touch that reflects her dedication to her craft and community.

Beyond the confines of her garage, Turner is a familiar face at Lake Linganore and New Market community events, engaging with neighbors and community members who adore her work. Her active participation in local gatherings reflects her natural desire to foster positive connections and spread the spirit of inclusivity.

Since settling in Frederick, Turner longed for more diversity in local businesses. Rooted in her Latin-American heritage, she birthed Domadera Design, a haven for unique, culturally and community-inspired home decor and accessories. For Turner, it's not just about the pieces; it's about crafting a space where everyone sees a reflection of themselves.

"Domadera Design isn't just pieces of wood; it's about weaving impactful connections throughout the Frederick community," Turner warmly emphasizes.

Turner collaborates with local organizations, pouring love into supporting women and youth. Through her platform, she champions unity, diversity, and community engagement.

Another customer shared, "Eunice is a dream to work with!! I told her what I'd like the sign to say and sent her a photo of the pillows on my deck... I absolutely love it and will be having her create gifts for me in the future."

Looking ahead, Turner envisions expanding her craft to a broader audience, aiming to secure professional commissions from local businesses. She is eager to adorn local establishments with her unique creations, making her art a visual celebration for all in the Frederick, Maryland community to enjoy and appreciate.

Turner said she was honored to recently be accepted as a local Artist by the Delaplaine Arts Center located in historic downtown Frederick on Carroll Street. The arts center even invited her to showcase her work in the studio's gallery this coming April.

Yet, Domadera Design's impact extends beyond the tangible. Turner envisions more than just beautiful decor with Domadera Design. As she passionately crafts her pieces, she shares, "My dream is to one day open a place for high school students who love woodworking and where they can come and make things to start their own business and dreams. I've spent time at Frederick High School and worked with students. We created an amazing sign, one of my happiest days ever."

Turner described the Spanish-speaking connections she's made in the schools with students and staff who aspire to see their dreams come true as her calling.

Beyond local impact, Turner yearns to ignite the dreams of fellow Latin-American women.

"I want to be a source of encouragement, a spark that fuels dreams. It's not just about breaking barriers; it's about leaving a trail for others to follow and succeed on their own journeys," Turner said.
