Cast elastomers refer to rubber-like polymers that stretch for further than other kinds of materials and, like springs, snap back into shape when the force is released. These are all polymers that expand with force and then return to their original shape after removing the force applied. These are used in bearings, wear strips, bumpers, shock absorbers, and slide plates.

The main types of cast elastomers are hot-cast elastomer and cold cast elastomer. Hot cast elastomers are used in rigorous applications that include the highest performance. The processing of hot-cast elastomers involves heated components tooling along with a hot post-cure to optimize properties. The different distribution channels include online, and offline and are used by several sectors such as mining, automotive and transportation, industrial, oil and gas, and others.
