Clinical chemistry is a quantitative field of study that measures the concentrations of biologically significant chemicals, or analytes, in bodily fluids.

The main types of products in clinical chemistry are analyzers, reagents, and consumables. The term 'analyzer' refers to a laboratory device that is used to determine the concentration of certain compounds in samples of serum, plasma, urine, and/or other bodily fluids and a device that initiates reactions utilising reagents using the pale-yellow supernatant part (serum) of centrifuged blood or urine samples. The different applications include general chemistry tests, liver function tests, kidney function tests, urinalysis, electrolyte panels, lipid profiles, specialty chemical tests, and others that are used in hospitals, diagnostic and pathology centers, ambulatory surgery centers, and other end users.
