What are Retort Pouches?

Retort pouches are a type of flexible packaging commonly used for preserving and sterilizing food products. They are made from a laminate of multiple layers, including plastic films, aluminum foil, and other materials to provide a barrier against oxygen, moisture, and light. The pouches are designed to withstand high temperatures and pressures during the retort process, which involves cooking the food inside the pouch to kill bacteria and extend shelf life. As compared to traditional packaging methods, such as cans and glass jars, retort pouches are lightweight, portable, and convenient, making them ideal for on-the-go consumption. Moreover, they reduce storage space requirements and offer better product visibility, enhancing the overall consumer experience. As a result, retort pouches find extensive applications across the food and beverages (F&B), pet food, healthcare, and personal care industries.
