"All God's children are strong-willed. Some, however, are more strong-willed than others. Some very strong-willed children get diagnosed. You don't want that. Some even get medicated. You definitely don't want that," informs Rosemond.

Rosemond laid out seven steps for parents to take when instructing their children. He says often, parents are in a state of denial concerning their child's behavior and give sound advice on how to stop this problem.

1. Use the fewest words possible: Most instructions can be communicated in five words or less.
2. Preface your brief instruction with authoritative prefaces such as "I want you to."
3. Erase the word "okay" from parenting vocabulary.
4. Do not describe the consequence of disobedience. Deliver it.

5. Do not explain yourself: Children make arguments out of everything.
6. Use the phrase "Because I said so."
7. Walk away.

Following these seven strategies will deliver the results parents of strong-willed children seek. Rosemond also laid out four rules for providing consequences.

1. Do not repeat instructions.
2. Do not be impulsive about delivering consequences: "Take your time."
3. Do not tell the child what you intend to do.
4. The punishment should never fit the crime.

Rosemond says his tactics for parenting strong-willed children have proven effective for countless parents. The problem is often the parent. These tips for parenting a strong-willed child will help parents avoid a trip to the therapist and will help get the child back on the right track, Rosemond adds.
