Car insurance rates have increased 26% since 2023, and those rates are projected to stay high for the foreseeable future. The increase in rates is due to a variety of factors, including the rising cost of vehicle parts and labor due to inflation, the increase in crash fatalities in recent years, and extreme weather events like fires and flooding that have destroyed vehicles and caused claims to skyrocket.

In response to escalating insurance costs, Safe2Drive, a leading provider of online traffic safety and driver education courses, reports a significant surge in course enrollment, particularly in their courses that can qualify a driver for a discount on their auto insurance. Some of their courses have seen over a 100% increase in student enrollment over this time last year.

“We recognize the challenges that drivers are facing right now in this tough economic climate,” said Carl Reese, owner of Safe2Drive. “We pride ourselves on offering a quick, convenient and cost-effective way for drivers to offset rising costs on their auto insurance.”

Safe2Drive’s insurance discount courses are relatively inexpensive (course prices vary by state but average around $24.95 per course), and take only a few hours to complete, which students can do at their own pace. The courses can be taken completely online and are accessible from any device with an internet connection (phone, tablet or desktop).

The amount of the insurance discount depends on your insurance provider, but some states such as Delaware mandate as much as a 10% discount for completing an initial course, and mandate even bigger discounts if you complete a refresher course.
