HUNTSVILLE, ALABAMA, UNITED STATES, March 1, 2024

/EINPresswire.com/ -- "No Man's Law," an Alabama-made independent film, is drawing big streaming audiences worldwide.

Suicidal ex-Border Patrol agent Dee Duncklee blames himself for letting a migrant family drown in the Rio Grande River a decade ago. He believes his soul is cursed, as the fallout from the tragedy cost him his marriage and the death of his son.

He unknowingly rescues an undocumented migrant girl who hides in the back of his truck. When Dee discovers her and learns her plight, he decides that, rather than turn her over to the Border Patrol for deportation, he will bring her to her parents, who are migrant laborers working on a farm in Alabama. There's one big problem - it's illegal, and to do this means he's committing human trafficking. A manhunt ensues but Dee will obey no man's law in his quest to return the migrant girl to her parents.

No Man's Law is action-packed drama,

How we treat immigrants says much about our character as human beings. As Dee says in the movie, 'what's right is right and what's wrong is wrong, or have we all forgotten that?'"

Jensen said as populations in Gaza, Ukraine, Sudan, Syria, Yemen, Mexico and Central America are displaced by war and famine, human rights of migrants are very much on the minds of people worldwide.

"I'm thrilled that 'No Man's Law' has touched the hearts and minds of movie fans worldwide. It's an important story that's still a massive controversy globally. How do we treat the immigrants we encounter? What about their human rights?" Jensen said.
