Collagen is a protein found in various animal tissues, including skin, bones, and cartilage. It is a key component of the extracellular matrix, providing structural support and facilitating cell communication. Collagen is widely used in various industries, including food, pharmaceuticals, and cosmetics.

The North American healthcare and pharmaceutical industries also support the expansion of the collagen market. In orthopaedic surgery, wound healing, and tissue regeneration, collagen is used in medical applications. Because collagen is essential for treating age-related health issues, the region's aging population has increased demand for collagen-based medical products. Collagen is a vital component of skincare products, anti-aging formulas, and beauty supplements in the cosmetics and personal care sector. Collagen is widely used in cosmetic formulations due in part to the North American consumer base's emphasis on beauty and anti-aging solutions.
