“Spring break is an opportunity for many families to spend extra time with their children,” said Shannon Rojecki, Greentrike's director of early learning and museums. “We're excited to open the Children's Museum of Tacoma for two extra days so parents and caregivers can have a space to connect with their children in an environment that nourishes play.”

Admission to the Children’s Museum of Tacoma is known as Pay As You Will, which means that the cost of entry is always donation-based. The Children’s Museum of Tacoma switched to a Pay As You Will model in 2012 to increase access to play, early learning programs, and safe spaces for every child and their family. The Children’s Museum of Tacoma and its sister location, the Children’s Museum at Joint Base Lewis-McChord, continue to be the only two children’s museums in the country with donation-only admission for all visitors.

The Children’s Museum of Tacoma features five nature-inspired playscapes called Water, Woods, Voyager, Climb, and Airways, as well as an art studio filled with paint, paper, brushes, and much more. The Museum’s playscapes were created to cultivate open-ended play and engage children’s boundless imaginations. All playscapes are designed for children and adults, encouraging families to connect through play.
