Besides, Penny doesn't want Grandmama to die- she's the only family she has, and her iconic pink Venetian-style mansion at the end of Worth Avenue, known as Palazzo Leoni, is the only place she can call home.

But her grandmother does die, and Penny is forced to return to Palm Beach to settle her affairs, and presumably, to inherit her estate, including Palazzo Leoni.

But of course, things are rarely as they seem, and it turns out that the mansion was built on dark secrets, rotten to the core, and crumbling around her, just like Penny's life seems to be. In the midst of her unraveling identity, Penny needs a distraction, and lo and behold, it appears, in the very sexy form of William, the handsome handyman for the apartment building where she's staying until she can figure out her life. Penny is instantly drawn to William, but he seems to be struggling with his own desires, leaving Penny suffering from emotional whiplash, feeling jealous and confused.

Penny had sworn off relationships, but for William, even though he's not her usual type, she would be willing to change her mind- if only he wanted her.

Will the hot handyman be Penny's knight in shining armor or her ultimate undoing? And is he really who he says he is?
