The fighters who come to Ukraine from abroad are very brave. I trust the air defense and soldiers of Ukraine. I think we all need to believe in each other and build the country as best we can.”

Vlad Eliseev

Boxing had been stopped for many months in Ukraine due to the Russian invasion. Now, officials have approved this event despite ongoing attacks in Kyiv, the nation's capital. Last week, 29 missiles were intercepted before hitting Kyiv. Also, 88 missiles and 63 Shahed drones fell on the cities of Kharkiv, Dnipro, Lviv, Vinnytsia and Zaporizhzhia. Amid the adversity, promoter Vlad Eliseev is determined to help his fellow citizens get on with their lives, and the production is expected to be sold out and packed with fans and participants.

“The fighters who come to Ukraine from abroad are very brave, but also probably a bit crazy,” said Eliseev. “But what I can say is that Kyiv has a very good defense. I do feel safe, and I trust the air defense and soldiers of Ukraine. I think we all need to have belief in each other at this time. It is a big pain to all of us, but we have to continue to build the country in all aspects as best we can.”
