The Women's College Club Championships is proof that there is demand out there for young women who want to play baseball and never felt they could before.”

In addition to the six teams that have been invited this year, nearly a dozen more students are working with Baseball For All to jumpstart women's college club baseball programs at their own universities. This follows the national trend of growth, as a rising number of girls and women are participating in baseball across the U.S., with a 35% increase in girls playing on their respective high school baseball teams.

“The Women's College Club Championships is proof that there is demand out there for young women who want to play baseball and never felt they could before,” says Justine Siegal, founder of Baseball For All. “Future grassroots developments like these need to ensure girls know from an early age that they are always welcome to play this great game.”

All teams will be hosted by the Los Angeles Dodgers Training Academy in Redondo Beach, CA for a welcome event, in which all players will have an opportunity to tour and train in their top-notch facility.

The Women's College Club Baseball program is part of Baseball For All's big-picture efforts to create systemic change for girls in baseball. As the program grows with each year, the organization makes monumental forward progress in its efforts to establish women's baseball as an NCAA Emerging Sport—and ultimately open doors for even more girls to continue playing baseball at the next level.
