Definition:

Construction sealants are materials used in building and construction projects to fill gaps, joints, and seams, creating a watertight, airtight, or fire-resistant barrier. These sealants are typically applied to various surfaces such as concrete, metal, wood, glass, and masonry to prevent water infiltration, air leakage, and the passage of dust, insects, or noise. They come in various forms including caulks, silicones, polyurethanes, and acrylics, each with specific properties suited for different applications and environmental conditions. Construction sealants play a crucial role in maintaining the integrity and longevity of structures by sealing gaps and preventing moisture-related damage, air leakage, and energy loss.
