"Legal jargon has long been a barrier for many organizations, particularly those operating in the non-profit space with limited resources," said William Theos, founder and CEO of Legalese Decoder. "We believe that clear and understandable legal communication should be a right, not a privilege. This grant program is our way of supporting the invaluable work of non-profits and charities by removing language obstacles that can impede their progress."

The Legalese Decoder Business plan offers a comprehensive range of features designed to simplify and clarify legal terminology. With a 1,000,000-word decoding limit, the ability to process up to 2,000 pages, and a maximum capacity of 8,000,000 characters, the plan provides ample resources for non-profits to navigate even the most complex legal documents with ease.

Additionally, the Business plan includes access to a legal "non-advisor" feature that can answer questions related to legal terminology, as well as an advanced contract analyzer that assesses risks, fairness, and potential anomalies within contracts.

To be eligible for the grant, non-profit organizations and charities must meet certain criteria, including being legally registered for at least one year, having an active community or social initiative, and committing to providing usage feedback to Legalese Decoder.

"We understand that legal complexities can be a significant barrier for non-profits, often hindering their ability to make informed decisions and allocate resources effectively," added Theos. "By removing this obstacle, we hope to empower these organizations to focus on their core missions and drive positive change within their communities."
