In terms of revenue share, the North American region dominated the market in 2021. US and Canada are included in this region. The US consumer population's ongoing use of digital wallets and mobile payments is largely responsible for the market's expansion in this area. It is anticipated that technological developments in the North American digital payment sector would open up attractive new market prospects. This platform provides the option to split payments for online purchases using different credit and debit cards without incurring interest or other fees. In this way, it is anticipated that the platform would assist users in lowering the cost load on individual cards, enhancing financial privacy, and raising credit scores.

In the market for digital payments, Asia-Pacific is regarded as having the fastest growth. China, India, Japan, South Korea, and the rest of the world are all included in this region. One of the key reasons propelling market expansion is the major countries in this region's initiatives to improve the digital payment industry. For instance, the Indian government is actively pursuing its plan to digitise the financial and economic sectors. Bharat Interface for Money-Unified Payments Interface (BHIM-UPI), which was recently introduced, has become one of the preferred payment methods for Indian citizens. The Asia-Pacific area is expanding due to China's rapid growth in the digital payment sector. The two most popular digital payment systems in the nation, WeChat Pay and Alipay, are used by more than 90% of urban Chinese consumers.
