

"I Can Do All Things" Makes History with First African-American Lead with Down Syndrome in Full Feature Film

Screenwriter Andree M. Harris Pioneers Representation and Inclusivity in Film during Women's History Month

WASHINGTON, DC, UNITED STATES, April 30, 2024 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Andree M. Harris, a trailblazing screenwriter and producer, has made cinematic history with the release of "I Can Do All Things," the groundbreaking film featuring the first African-American lead with Down Syndrome. Released on YouTube in 2024, this inspirational drama marks a significant milestone in the entertainment industry, breaking barriers and championing inclusivity.

"I Can Do All Things" follows the journey of Star Cooper, a determined teenager with Down Syndrome, who aspires to join an inclusive program at her school. Despite her unwavering passion and courage, Star faces resistance from her apprehensive mother. The film explores themes of determination, acceptance, and the pursuit of dreams against all odds.

The film boasts a talented ensemble cast including Courtney Gaines, Cherrill R Ashton, Rod Irish, Monika Willis, and Tammi Rogers. Andree M. Harris serves as both the producer and the writer and director of this groundbreaking project. Nakia Dillard joins as the assistant director, contributing to the film's vision and execution.

"I Can Do All Things" is a heartfelt creation born from a parent's love and dedication. Inspired by their own child with special needs, the writer sought to illuminate the importance of inclusivity in the arts. The film celebrates the unique talents and abilities of individuals with Down Syndrome, advocating for representation and empowerment.

With "I Can Do All Things," Andree M. Harris has shattered stereotypes and opened doors for underrepresented voices in cinema. This landmark film marks the first time an African-American
