Last-mile distribution is an extremely complicated industry vastly dependent on the local environment. City infrastructure differs from the crowded streets of Mumbai against the less thickly populated stretch of Munich to the sprawl of Los Angeles. Local regulations, the accessibility and cost of labor, traffic intensity, shopping behavior, and so on, all rely on where companies need to get their customers and ensure that deliveries are met on time without losses and in a cost-efficient approach. Like several allied industries, the last mile sector is undergoing a massive revolution propelled by rising customer requirements aided by
