Acute lymphocytic leukemia Overview:

Acute lymphocytic leukemia (ALL), is a type of cancer that affects the blood and bone marrow. It starts from young white blood cells called lymphocytes in the bone marrow; mainly characterized by an overproduction of immature white blood cells, called lymphoblasts or leukemic blasts. The exact causes of ALL remain largely unknown, but it is thought to result from mutations in one or more of the genes that normally control blood cell development. This mutation will result in abnormal growth.
