Complement 3 Glomerulopathy Overview

Complement 3 Glomerulopathy (C3G) is a rare and serious kidney disorder characterized by abnormal activation of the complement system, leading to inflammation and damage in the glomeruli, the filtering units of the kidneys. It is caused by dysregulation of the alternative pathway of the complement system, resulting in excessive deposition of complement component C3 within the glomeruli. This deposition leads to glomerular injury, proteinuria (excessive protein in the urine), hematuria (blood in the urine), and progressive loss of kidney function. C3G encompasses two main subtypes: dense deposit disease (DDD) and C3 glomerulonephritis (C3GN), each with distinct histological features. Diagnosis typically involves kidney biopsy and specialized laboratory testing to evaluate complement levels and function. Treatment options are limited and often focus on managing symptoms and slowing disease progression, although research into targeted therapies aimed at modulating the complement system is ongoing. Early detection and intervention are crucial for improving outcomes in individuals with C3G.
