Alport Syndrome Overview

Alport Syndrome is a genetic disorder affecting the kidneys, ears, and eyes, primarily caused by mutations in genes responsible for producing collagen, a crucial protein in the body's connective tissues. This syndrome primarily manifests as progressive kidney disease, leading to renal failure in severe cases. Symptoms often include hematuria (blood in urine), proteinuria (protein in urine), high blood pressure, and hearing loss, typically starting in childhood or adolescence. Ocular abnormalities like lens dislocation and retinopathy may also occur. Diagnosis involves genetic testing, kidney biopsy, and evaluation of symptoms. Treatment aims to manage symptoms and slow kidney damage progression through medications controlling blood pressure and proteinuria. In advanced stages, kidney transplant or dialysis may be necessary. Regular monitoring and early intervention are vital in managing the condition and preventing complications.
