This past summer, Interport's creative prowess was fully displayed in Wildwood, NJ, where modified containers were the foundation for vibrant boardwalk amusements. These transformations are not only a testament to Interport's engineering and design capabilities but also showcase the versatility of shipping containers beyond traditional storage or transport uses.

Adding to its portfolio of unique projects, Interport recently completed a new 40-foot container kiosk. Designed for multiple uses, this kiosk is perfect for food and beverage services, game stations, or ticket sales. The mobility and durability of these containers make them ideal for seasonal and permanent business operations.

Looking ahead, Interport is setting the stage for sustainable living. Shipping containers are being converted into a modern, eco-friendly home, demonstrating the potential for shipping container-based architecture in residential construction.

Interport's modification capabilities include but are not limited to creating custom offices, luxury retail spaces, and innovative housing solutions. Each project is approached with a deep understanding of the client's vision, ensuring that every modification is functional and aesthetically pleasing.

"Shipping containers are like blank canvases," said Tracy Foy, Director of Container Sales. "Our job is to transform them in ways that exceed our clients' expectations. From simple modifications to complex renovations, we leverage our extensive industry experience and cutting-edge facilities to deliver unparalleled results."
