When my friend Arnold Palmer told me about his childhood love of Pinehurst, he looked at me and said, very seriously, "Shakespeare, anyone who loves Pinehurst is a true son or daughter of the game.""

Assembly Podcast, in association with Perfect Cadence Productions and Plott Hound Media, proudly presents "The Pinehurst Cure and the Road to the US Open," a stirring, heartfelt, and sweeping narrative story of how golf's greatest champions found magic on the hallowed fairways of the most celebrated golf course in America, Pinehurst No. 2, now available on Apple Podcasts, Spotify, Audible, and everywhere podcasts are found.

In every sport, there's a moment that transcends time. For New York Times bestselling golf writer, James Dodson, the most transcendent moment in golf occurred on Father's Day 1999, in the final round of the US Open at Pinehurst.

Payne Stewart had a one-shot lead with two giants behind him—Phil Mickelson and Tiger Woods. Stewart was on the cusp of an incredible comeback. He'd quit drinking and had a renewed spiritual focus. All he had to do was make one 15-foot putt on one of the hardest greens in golf, in front of the world. Dodson watched Stewart sink the putt and win the US Open. The spectacular conclusion to Stewart's story of hubris, struggle, and redemption, Dodson believes, could only have happened in one place: Pinehurst, North Carolina.

While living in Pinehurst, Dodson discovered a phenomenon he calls "The Pinehurst Cure." It's the place's particular magic to change the lives of people when they need it most, including Payne Stewart, Michelle Wie, Arnold Palmer, Ben Hogan, Donald Ross, and Harvie Ward, who Dodson calls "the greatest golfer most people have never heard of."

Through immersive storytelling penned and read by award-winning golf writer James Dodson

("Final Rounds," "A Golfer's Life" with Arnold Palmer, and "Ben Hogan—An American Life"), the narrative podcast "The Pinehurst Cure and the Road to the US Open" will transform every listener.

Episode 1 of "The Pinehurst Cure and the Road to the US Open" debuted on June 12th. The next two episodes will be released every week on Wednesdays.
