Definition:

Geofencing is a location-based system that creates virtual walls around particular geographic areas using GPS, RFID, Wi-Fi, or mobile cellular data. Businesses and organizations may arrange these borders, also known as "fences," operationally so that when a mobile device enters the designated area, a certain action or notification is sent to the device. Geofencing techniques open up a world of possibilities, like targeting advertisements and marketing to customers depending on where they are and improving security by keeping an eye on who is allowed access to designated zones. Utilizing real-time location data, this technology is widely used in industries including retail, hospitality, transportation, and real estate to personalize experiences, maximize productivity, and concentrate on operations.
