has been named one of The Washington Post's Top Workplaces in the Washington, D.C. area for the second consecutive year. This prestigious recognition is based solely on employee feedback gathered through an anonymous survey administered by Energage, LLC. The survey measured various aspects of workplace culture, including alignment, execution, and connection. This year's honorees include a diverse group of companies, such as government contractors, real estate firms, consulting groups, and tech companies.

Erin Federle, Vice President of Human Resources at Decision Lens, has been instrumental in fostering a mission-driven culture while ensuring a healthy work-life balance as the company transitioned to a fully remote model at the end of 2023. “We have continued to thrive since moving to fully remote. Our employees love the flexibility this setup offers, giving them more time to focus on solving the challenges our customers face. Our team is consistently engaged with diverse and meaningful projects, helping the public sector modernize how it prioritizes, plans, and funds. We are incredibly proud to be recognized again as a top workplace in the Washington area,” said Federle.

In the past year, Decision Lens has achieved unprecedented annual bookings growth with strong momentum continuing into the current year. The company's mission to transform government prioritization, planning, and funding processes has led to the adoption of its software by new departments in the Navy, Air Force, Army, Office of the Secretary of Defense, Federal Civilian agencies, and state and local government agencies.

“Our people are driven by our mission – to revolutionize the decision-making required for great achievements,” said CEO John Saaty. “When my brother Dan Saaty and I founded Decision Lens, we never imagined the profound impact it would have on modernizing government planning. It’s incredible to continue being recognized as a driving force in driving our government to align their funding with their missions.”

The Washington Post hosted an awards ceremony on June 20 to honor the top-ranked companies.

About Decision Lens
