Rising Incidence of Communication Disorders Drives Market Growth

The prevalence of communication disorders, encompassing speech, language, voice, fluency, and swallowing difficulties, continues to rise. Neurological conditions affecting the brain's speech and language centers contribute significantly to this trend. For instance, developmental language disorders alone affect approximately 7% of children, with about 2% of them having coexisting conditions like autism or intellectual disabilities. In the United States, 5% of children ages 3–17 experienced a speech disorder lasting a week or more in the past year, highlighting the critical need for speech therapy services.
