Acute Ocular Pain Therapeutics Market

Therapeutic options for managing AOP include non-pharmacological treatment, such as bandage contact lenses, topical ocular cycloplegic agents, topical ocular nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory agents (NSAIDs), and oral pharmaceutical agents. For treating patients with acute pain, there are generally two categories of oral medications: nonopioid medications and opioid medications. Nonopioid oral medications include prescription or OTC NSAIDs and acetaminophen. Pain associated with surgery, injury, infection, or inflammation at the front of the eye is typically treated with a topical steroid, topical NSAID, systemic NSAID, lubricant ointment, gel or drops, bandage contact lens, or a few doses of oral opiate or topical anesthetic.

Acute Ocular Pain Market Insights

Therapy for AOP represents an area of significant unmet need. Understanding the AOP microenvironment is critical relative to improving the efficiency of current therapies and the development of more effective approaches. Most of the available treatments in the market target the underlying disease, for example, uveitis, dry eye disease, etc.; hence no approved therapy specifically AOP for exists. Topical and systemic therapies against receptors triggering and processing pain sensations are needed. Readily established systemically applied pain therapies are need to be tested for efficacy in ocular pain. So more companies should be involved in developing the pipeline for targeting the acute ocular patient pool.
