Definition:

A computerized platform called student admissions software helps educational institutions streamline the process of enrolling new students. Moreover, it serves as a consolidated application processing hub, allowing prospective students to electronically submit their transcripts and applications. Administrative personnel can use the program to evaluate these submissions, keep track of deadlines, and communicate with candidates in the interim. As a result, the admissions process is efficient and well-organized for both staff and students. Additionally, student admissions software improves the transparency, efficiency, and organization of the admissions process for both applicants and universities.

Market Drivers:

- increasing number of students, and growing demand for personalized admissions experiences

Market Opportunities:

- growing popularity of international students
