Definition: Outplacement is a kind of support service that is provided by some of the organizations so as to help the former employees transition towards new jobs. A consultancy firm generally provides the outplacement services which are usually paid for by the former employer and are attained through practical advice, workshops, and training materials. Some of the companies may even offer psychological support. Outplacement is either carried out through individual one-on-one sessions or in the group format. Some of the topics of discussions include career guidance, job search skills, career evaluation, resume writing, targeting the job market, developing networks, interview preparation, and negotiation. Consultants provide support to the individuals seeking a new job, and also to those who are looking forward to starting a new business or structure a collection of activities. These programs have set time limits that can be ranging from a few months to some additional extended periods, such as around 12 months and are presented at all the levels of an organization, from the workers to the corporate employees. Outplacement provides the former employees with a structure and guidance towards their new career options and hence preserves the morale of those who still remain in the company and those who see that their colleagues are given the essential support when they are to leave the company.
