Dispersant Polymer Market Definition

The dispersant polymers are used to improve the dispersion stability of suspended solids in water. The dispersant polymer refers to low-molecular-weight anionic polymers with anionic functional groups. The anionic functional group gives a negative charge, and the hydrocarbon chain of the polymer gives a surface area to a dispersant molecule. A dispersant molecule is a specially crafted polymer that must meet four standards: sufficient negative charge, the ability of the functional group to ionize or deprotonate in water into ions, controlled molecular size or molecular weight, and the right choice of a functional group to provide necessary charge density so that repulsive forces between the molecules can overcome mutual attraction by Vander wall forces.
