Gladiatrix is based on the novel The Crescent by Las Vegas author Cynthia Vespia. It tells the story of two women, one a slave and the other a queen, who become unexpected allies in the Gladiator's arena. The novel was adapted for the screen by Donnelly himself.

"I had the good fortune to meet Cynthia several years ago and became a fan of her work," Donnelly says. "I loved that so many of her characters are strong women and that's exactly the type of stories I wanted to tell through LFC Films."

Vespia introduced Donnelly to her Godfather, a film producer named Greg Munsell, who, as it turned out, was also a fan of Lingerie Fighting Championships. Munsell had made a death-bed promise to Vespia's father before he passed that somehow, some way, he'd help turn her first novel into a film. Donnelly and Munsell soon teamed up to fulfill this promise.

"I was so moved by their story and what it meant to everyone that it quickly became an obsession for me as well," Donnelly says. "We came very close to making the movie in 2020 – we were actually holding auditions that March when Covid shut everything down."

Raising the money for a movie set in the 3rd Century AD featuring dozens of female gladiators fighting in an arena was no small task and only came about when Donnelly's long time film distributor, Factory Film Studio, joined the project. Factory's Chief Creative Officer, Michael Patrick Lilly, was looking for a project they could shoot at their new 10 acre lot (which features a 55,000 sq ft studio) and felt Gladiatrix would be a perfect fit. Construction crews are currently hard at work building all the sets needed for the film including an immense gladiator's arena.

Of her motivation to write the novel, Vespia says, "I was looking for an idea for my first novel when I came across an article that they had found remains in Rome proving for the first time that women also fought as gladiators. I found the idea so compelling I knew I had to write about it."

"Naturally with LFC Films involved we were always going to cast some of our fighters," Donnelly says. "They really are modern day gladiators."
