“The award recognizes the important role volunteers play in bolstering America's strength and deeply reflects the core values upheld by VertexOne,” VertexOne Chief Human Resource Officer, Elizabeth Reed said. “We believe that giving back to the communities in which we live and serve is not just a responsibility, but a privilege, and a cornerstone of who we are as a company.”

“When we talk about our “Do Rights” this isn't just corporate lip-service,” VertexOne Chief Executive Officer, Andrew Jornod added, referring to the company's quartet of core values. “They're the foundational pillars of who we are not just as a company, but as the individuals who encompass it.”

“Our commitment to bettering our communities extends far beyond our own vested interests as a business entity but is a prerogative of each and every one of us who strive to leave this world better than we found it,” Jornod said. “So to be named an official certifying organization for the PVSA is an exceptional honor and an outstanding way to celebrate our extraordinary employees who embody our values of volunteerism and community service, and reflect the best of the American spirit.”

As a certifying organization, VertexOne will help keep validated records of their employee's volunteer activities and hours, nominate potential recipients of the award, and distribute awards to those who meet or exceed the award criteria. Employees will also be eligible for VertexOne's

Volunteer Time Off (VTO) policy which grants employees additional flexibility to volunteer for the cause of their choice.
