Definition:
A data historian, also known as a process historian or industrial historian, is designed to collect and archive time-stamped data points, such as temperatures, pressures, flow rates, and other process variables from sensors, control systems, and other data sources. The data is stored in a highly efficient manner that allows for quick retrieval and analysis.

Market Trends:
• Increasing adoption of IIoT technologies is driving the demand for data historians to manage the vast amounts of data generated by connected devices.

Market Drivers:
• Growing need for operational efficiency and process optimization in industries driving the adoption of data historians.

Market Opportunities:
• Untapped potential in emerging markets where industrial digitization is on the rise.

Market Challenges:
• High initial costs associated with the deployment of data historian systems can be a barrier for small and medium-sized enterprises.

Market Restraints:
• Economic uncertainties and downturns can lead to reduced investment in new technologies, including data historian systems.
