Unlike most traditional education loan providers, Fortify does not consider students' credit scores during the application process. Instead, it bases lending decisions on the occupations skills a student pursues and the cost-to-income ratio of their preferred program. This approach widens access to education, providing students with the benefits of feasible payment plans while Fortify assumes lending risks. Fortify also assumes regulatory risks typically passed to students, offering finances from internal assets in ways that eliminate fees otherwise passed to students.

“Fortify provides our students with flexible payment options when it comes to financing their education” said

Shamsah Noorani, CEO of Health Tech Academy. “They share in our mission to make education affordable, and we’re thrilled to partner with them in ways that break down financial barriers.”

Health Tech Academy has partnered with Fortify because of its status as a learner-first lending partner. They maintain transparent pricing, with competitive loan terms that don't feature any hidden fees. Students can apply online and receive instant decisions on their applications. Loan duration will depend on the amount a student borrows to ensure they can make payments on-time.

Fortify is currently available in 20 states, with plans to secure lending licenses in all states within the next 12 to 18 months.

"No student should have to choose between their education and their wallet" said Health Tech Academy Product Manager Danish Khan. "This partnership with Fortify gives education an even more affordable price tag. We're equipping the next generation of allied health professionals, and we're thrilled to include Fortify in that roadmap."

Students can setup installment payment plans with Health Tech Academy through Fortify by visiting a direct gateway which collects information on their preferred program and start date before processing the submission.
